

Hi,

This is Rob with Dailywritingjobs.com. I've created this short video here to show you one method that you can use to find writing jobs online. This method is super-simple and it's one that you can use over and over again to find new writing opportunities once you get the hang of it.

This video actually covers one of the tips in my report, which you can grab a copy of after you're done watching this video, – on how you can use a search engine to find writing jobs. I won't really be going into the same detail here that you'll find in the report, but you can use the tips outlined in this video for free, and you can implement them as soon as you're done watching this video.

In any case – let's get started.

We're going to use Google for this example – but I highly suggest you try out other search engines, such as Yahoo and Live.com when you're trying this out yourself as different search engines will produce different results – which in this case is a better variety of potential writing jobs.

We'll use the phrase 'write for us' for our demonstration today. There are numerous other phrases that you can use, and I outline over 20 phrases and important trigger words that you can use in the report, but since this is just an introduction – we'll just focus on this one phrase. Plus, I'll be showing you different methods that you can use to fine-tune these results for your situation.

Step 1:

For the first part of this video we'll simply plug 'write for us' into Google and hit enter. You can see that about 30 million results pop up – that's quite a few but the majority of these results won't be what we're looking for anyway.

But – if we take a brief look around, we can see that there are possible opportunities right away. Feel free to look around, click through a few different pages and see if there's something that catches your eye. I'm not going to spend a lot of time on the results because I'm just showing you how to find writing jobs on your own, I'm not actually trying to find them for you.

As I stated – there are a lot of results here, and these are not going to be well targeted at all, but there are potential writing opportunities that you'll find using this method that will be filtered out using the other methods I'll outline over the next few minutes.

Step 2

We're going to tweak our search phrase a little bit and add the word 'pay' to it. Because you're likely looking for a paid writing job, this will be a logical step that you would use.

I recommend that you use a plus sign along with the query – like 'write for us+pay' as that will tell Google that you only want pages that have the word 'pay' in them.

This brings us a much shorter list of websites to look through – around 4 million. You'll notice that the word 'pay' is highlighted in these results – and that's what we were looking for, pages with the word 'pay' on them. You can substitute 'pay' with 'paid' or 'payment' if you wish – and this will give you a bigger pool of results to look through.

Step 3

Now – so far we've been using the phrase 'write for us' as a broad match – meaning that the websites displayed may not actually have the words 'write for us' on them. That's fine, but now we want to start narrowing things down a little bit. If we add parenthesis around the phrase 'write for us', Google will only show us web pages with that phrase on them.

So – once we plug that phrase in with parenthesis, we're seeing under 2 million results, a far cry from the initial 30 million plus results without parenthesis. You'll probably notice that you're seeing a few pages that you saw with our first search – and that's to be expected.

Step 4

If you want, you can plug in the plus sign and the words 'pay', 'payment' and 'paid' at this point – that will help narrow down your results some. Just be sure to keep '+pay' outside of the parenthesis or you won't be getting the results you're looking for.

Step 5

This next step will help us to focus-in on the type of writing job we're looking for considerably. We're actually going to invoke a special search command that Google uses, the 'intitle' command. Now, you can use this command outside of the parameters that we're using it in now, but using it at this point helps to give us the most targeted results.

What we'll do is enter intitle:"write for us" into the search field. However, we want to include an additional keyword – one that represents the topic of what we would like to write about.

As an example, let's say that you're interested writing about SEO, or search engine optimization. So, what we'll do is add SEO to the search phrase like so. Basically this is telling Google to show us the websites that have the phrase 'write for us' in the title and have SEO somewhere in the page. This narrows things down to less than 50 results – and it's highly targeted for somebody that is looking to perform writing services related to SEO.

You can repeat this with other topics: news, gardening, marketing and so forth. You'll find that using different variations of a word will give you different results, such as garden, gardening, gardens.

This is just a brief overview of one method that you can use to find writing jobs online. If you're interested, I've put together a rough transcription of this video and you can find a link for it on the Daily Writing Jobs.com homepage under the video there.

I'm sure that if you take the time to use the steps outlined in this video that you'll be able to find writing jobs using search engines alone with relative ease. Now, if you want to find more writing jobs – I highly recommend that you check out the daily writing jobs report, which will not only expand on how to use search engines to find writing jobs, but it gives you a wealth of resources with helpful commentary that can put you on the path to making money online as a freelance writer – regardless of your writing experience.

Thanks for watching and I hope to see you on my website soon.
